

Title: What being rank 1 Annie World and reaching Challenger as an Annie Main has taught me

As a joke on my stream, someone had donated a dollar for me to play Annie and continued to tell me about LS' recommendations regarding her as a champion. I played her once, got hard stomped in lane but realized she was a lot more fun than I had believed.

I had always tried to play mechanically demanding champions, I've now become an Annie Main (reaching rank 1 annie in the world currently) as well as reaching challenger this season. Some things I learnt from this may help you climb or view the game a bit differently, as it really did for me.

1. You may have the hands to play a champion, but you still need to do that while keeping your other fundamentals solid. Often times I will face Yasuo, Irelia, Leblanc etc and simply win purely from managing waves, trading effectively and using minion aggro. From another perspective it just looks like i've pressed a few buttons to win but the nuances behind these small decisions can win your lane. Annie has relatively basic mechanics so i can simply focus all my attention into managing waves and other small decisions.

2. Small wins lead to big wins. Winning small trades, denying a cannon here and there, good pokes, using auto attacks to poke without taking minion aggro. They're all small things that ultimately create differences. These differences then translate to noticeable gaps which then set you up for success. Not only that, but these small things affect opponent's mental and play into mental warfare.

3. Set your jungler up and play towards them. In this meta of impactful dragons and jungler diff. It's ok to miss a bit if it means you can protect, follow or set up your jungler. If your jungler is pathing to make a play towards bot and you can identify your presence or your laning opponent's presence can make a difference. Set your wave up, sac it if you must (within reason) and help them get to where they need to so you can translate the plays into objectives.

4. If you main a weird champ/lower tier champ/whatever, don't let it discourage you from climbing. Don't make excuses but study what you need to to improve. Learn from your mistakes and if you're doing something way off, acknowledge when it simply just might not be working.

5. Find your playstyle and perfect it. Every annie guide i read and even high elo annie's would suggest Electrocute as the rune of choice. I run dark harvest every game and learnt to use it towards my playstyle and climb through it. It isn't a playstyle i can actively recommend to others but it worked towards what I aimed for and did.

6. Losers focus on Winners, Winners focus on winning.

Good luck on your climb everyone, and to be frank, if i can do it. Annie-one can
