

Title: Midlane macro and wave management

Score:

--- POST CONTENT ---

Hi everyone

I recently switched from toplane to midlane, I've never been a macro god but i'd really like get some tips on wave management and macros while playing as a midlaner

As a toplaner i played mainly juggernauts like Yorick, Illaoi and Sett. Now i main Aurora and I'm trying to learn Sylas.

Thank you for your answers!

Mid lane is all about connecting with your jungler. It only involves a few steps, but a lot of people below diamond or even master tier consistently get this wrong:

Track on which side your jungler is starting his clear throughout the game. If he starts bot he will make a play top and vice versa. Now place a ward on the side where he will end his clear. This allows you to easily connect with your jungler if you have lane priority. You can push a wave and then walk to the side bush to either hover, full commit, wait, cheese the enemy mid or recall. If you are ahead, you should buy a pink ward and place it on the correct side in the long vertical bush, then place a yellow trinket deeper into the jungle (this is necessary to snowball a lead and not just some extra tip). You don't want to make plays on your weakside, since this will give the enemy team man advantage.

Why is this so important? It allows you to predict ahead of time where your jungler will make a play. It consistently creates situations where your team has man advantage. You can't get cheesed, since you always play towards your vision. It reduces the distance to your jungler. Also, since you already know which side you are playing on, you don't waste time running circles after clearing a wave.

This entire strategy depends on you winning lane to get priority. That's where champion mastery comes into play. I can't teach you how to play Aurora or Sylas, but try to get to a point where you manage to have this kind of control over lane. If you have this vision setup and the freedom to move, you can pretty much smurf every game. Sadly, in low elo, junglers are kind of stupid, so good luck haha

Fundermental 1: Vision

Set up Vision in a way where you can track enemy jungle. He is the only one you cant permanently see so he is the biggest threat.

Fundermental 2: Wavesetup

There is 4 different forms of wavecontrol you need.

Slowpush

Hardpush/Crash

Freeze

Neutralise

When to use Slowpushes:

Slowpushes are setups when you need to leave the lane in form of a recall/roam/objective setup.

You want to do drake? Slowpush the wave and crash it 20 seconds before the objective so you set up vision first but dont give the enemy mid the chance to crash the next wave without using crucial abilities.

You want to recall and do a tempo reset? Slowpush the wave and crash it so your enemy laner is caught in lane.

You want to roam to botlane? Slowpush the wave.

You understand the concept!

When to hardpush:

Hardpushes are a way to deny minions to champs with low waveclear like pretty much every assassin. Think about the fact that you have less minions to deal damage if you get ganked so the risk for jungle is much higher.

A mage without mana falls under the same category as a low waveclear assassin.

You dont have recourses but they do? Bleed them of it.

When to Freeze:

If you have accute killthreat because of powerspikes countermatchups etc.

You want to deny the enemy mid all rescourses.

REMEMBER if you die while freezing your game is over. You will lose 3 waves of xp. Jungletracking is crutial. You force the enemy jungle to show himself and break the freeze.

When to Neutralise/Contest Minions:

Neutralising is something you wanna do if you are not in control over the wave. The goal is to midigate everything the enemy mid does listed above. Is he slowpushing into you. Thin out the wave before the objective starts. Is he freezing on you? Abuse his lack of vision and kill him with your jungler or break the freeze with him. Is he hardpushing? Kill him with your jungle. With other words if you dont have a jungler ure just fucked. The weakness of mages is the fact that they usually have to walk up without proper escape tools. Abuse them for it

Whoever shoves has the advantage. That shove creates a small window to place a ward / get a rotation for a low HP target on sides (never go past 1/3 of river if you're not committing to the play, otherwise enemy mid will get prio and you'll lose your advantage) / get a cheat recall pre-cannon.

Always ward raptors if your team doesn't get a ward deep jg. Never save your ward post 1:10. Knowing where enemy jg is &gt;&gt;&gt;&gt; everything else (any kind of play post clear you might wanna do). Warding raptors 1:10 ideal, since 90s duration + usually most jg clears get to their 4th camp on 2:35-2:40. Can ward at 1:15-20 but you risk getting cheesed on bush going back + no-one on your team able to cover you since they're already on their own stuff.

On lane, as aurora & sylas, both have completely different identities. Aurora relies on hitting Qs, if you can't hit Qs quit the champion. Trading is essential with control mages, if you drop too much HP because you're trying to get prio, it's useless, you need to be able to trade + get prio, cause if a skirmish for scuttle happens it's kinda cooked. Sylas is different, if you manage E hit lvl 1 then you can get prio, if not you need to concede until lvl 2 or 3, as all melee's basically. Sylas is better at skirmishes so it's a more kill reliant champion, you need stuff to happen. I won't go in-depth about compositions for which champs go well with them.

Also, if you move for a play, yet you have 3+ minions than enemy mid, and wave arrives when the play happens = cooked for you, enemy has freeze so they lose less than you by moving = you need to get that skirmish to work so you moving is worth the minions loss you might have. So before a play either shove completely so you pin them down and they have to choose, or move while freezing is happening but the play goes in your favour.

Always try to get a recall in minute 7, 1 minute before grub spawn, specially if you are sylas and your jg has strong early. Grubs are key, and you need to be as strong as possible for them. If enemy has based and has better items, and your top is even, then it's cooked.

As mid your team will whine so much more about you not moving for a roam or an objective. Champ identity plays a huge role in this (like if you're early champ / scaler / ....) and you should always think about this in champ select. Example, your jg plays nidalee and you lock in Veigar, your nidalee will prob want to invade and if you can't follow = jg pick is handicapped.

The paragraph above is the reason early game champs when played well usually roll over most control mages. Most people do not manage the wave well and don't pin these kinds of champs down in lane, letting them roam without losing anything (2 waves + plate T1).

Communication is key. Most people have complained in this subreddit that they can't follow roams or that their team ints even if they ping. Well, that's soloQ. And below masters they don't even check mid wave state or HP diff or prios. If you play a scaler, such as smolder/veigar, then deal with the consequences. Play selfish in these cases, mute all, and move on if your team feeds too much.

Aurora is decent in skirmish, and pre-level 6 isn't that bad. You need lchapter for mana issues and as I said hitting Q >>>>.
