

Title: Confused about wave management in mid to late game when ahead.

Score:

--- POST CONTENT ---

Hey, I just started playing ranked. I'm in bronze playing top and I'm confused about how I'm supposed to keep my farm up when ahead.

So what usually happens in my games after our team has taken the enemy's tier 2 towers is that the minion wave gets automatically frozen near where their tier 2 tower used to be. I've read that this happens because of the level of the minions is based on the team's average level, but I'm not sure what to do when the wave is like this.

Should I try to go and crash the wave while putting myself in a vulnerable position on their side of the map? Or should I just ignore it and play for the neutral objectives? Should the enemies be pushing these waves out and is this only a low elo issue?

--- TOP COMMENTS ---

[Comment 1 | Score: 2]

The answer to your questions has too much nuance depending on the game state to have a direct answer. You'll really only learn this by playing more/watching high elo top laners play. When your team is pressuring the map you should be doing the same. Most of this decision making happens based on awareness of where the enemies are or probably are on the map.

Can you 2v1 top/jg and you know where everyone else is? You can most likely push out the lane.

Is your team pressuring the rest of the map and will they get something on the other side if you get collapsed on and die? You should probably pressure up with them in that case.

Another thing to keep in mind is having teleport to join a fight for a neutral objective. You could pressure the opposite side then teleport in if needed for it.

There's too many edge cases to give one sure answer but make decisions with intention and act on them quickly. A lot of the time lower elo players waste time not knowing what they should do. Even if you make bad decisions, you can learn from them. And making quick decisions based on the game state is how you'll really improve. Should be asking yourself throughout the game what's next? Is dragon spawning? What turrets furthest out do they have left? Make your decisions based on those kind of thoughts.

Edit: oops I see you tagged about mid lane hah. But its gonna be similar advice regardless and often the midlaner is pushing out side waves as well. Seems your post is about top though?

[Comment 2 | Score: 1]

Don't worry about freezing and crashing waves at that point, just keep waves pushed as much as possible so you get free vision and can take towers as soon as you win a fight / the enemy abandons a lane

Play to win teamfights and get objectives, don't do things that will get you caught by multiple people

[Comment 3 | Score: 1]

Honestly you could pressure top when objectives are up. If their top lane matches no big deal. If they all come to you to take you down you could ping your team on the objective so its a trade. Or, if your team is contesting objective you could go for top and capitalize while your team stalls the enemy. These are just general ideas. Either way, have some vision for information on to how to play it out