

Title: To all Support players unaware of wave management as a support, you are severely giving your lane a disadvantage by treating minion waves as this untouchable force.

Score:

--- POST CONTENT ---

I have noticed that many supports especially lower elos treat minion waves as this untouchable force unless it's for relic passive. It seems that it is a big no-no for supports to even think about touching their ADCs wave but it's actually a huge disadvantage if you don't touch the wave at all. By not helping your ADC with wave management you are making their job a lot more harder especially against an enemy support who does have a better understanding of wave management.

So, how do you start to understand when it's ok to touch the minion waves or not? It's simple, just follow what your ADC is doing!

If you see your ADC pushing the wave, you push without last hitting. If you see your ADC freezing or only last hitting, DO NOT touch the wave as this will break the freeze.

There will be times when your ADC decides to freeze or push when it's the incorrect decision but it's crucial not to go against how they believe the wave should be managed at that point in time. The best option you have is to ping the enemy tower for example to let them know if you want to push the wave in or let them know in chat that it might be better to freeze. All you can do is offer suggestions, by telling them what to do or doing it anyway will cause tension in the lane which the worse possible situation to occur in the bot lane.

I do want to also point out that it's ok to last hit minions when there is no one around to take the gold, there's no point letting it go to waste.

This is obviously a very basic description of this topic and more of a stepping stone of how to get into wave management as a support. Wave management is one of the most important skills to learn in League and the sooner you learn how wave management works, the easier your life will become. It is vital for a Support to learn wave management just like any other role even if you are not the one CSing.

I hope this has helped :)

--- TOP COMMENTS ---

[Comment 1 | Score: 622]

good advice

though unfortunately a large number of supports are called off from attacking because their adc doesn't want their support to touch anything since they're either not confident enough to cs when someone else is lowering minion health in a correct way OR they don't trust the support to make them not lose cs (because some support players make it impossible to cs with how they're "lowering"...)

[Comment 2 | Score: 30]

once again this is a tip you will get flamed for if your rank is too low because low elo eadcs just struggle with minions and are confused if you ever touch them.

[Comment 3 | Score: 52]

I'm an ADC main who started playing support and my adc literally stop playing when I started hitting the minions to help shove the wave after we kill both enemy adc and support. I get that maybe that's why low elo supports are afraid to touch the minion wave lol

[Comment 4 | Score: 43]

I think a lot of ADCs force the idea of "wave is untouchable"

Was playing with a friend of a friend, as xerath, sup for ashe. Hes roaming up to mid, I stayed because their sup stayed. I last hit a single minion and he spams the ? ping on me.

First thing he typed in chat was

"See that 1 at the top right? You're sup it should say 0 for the entire game or you are inting"

Another game the ADC blamed the whole game (and his quite frankly shitty csing) on me hitting minions for my passive. Not minions under tower, not 1 health minions, full health canon and melee minions. One minion every roughly 15 seconds lost 50 health of like 500. Blamed me for him being down almost 100cs, said I lost him at least 40 cs.

Yes I know not everyone is like this, but the people that are like that make the game infuriating to play for everyone else

[Comment 5 | Score: 59]

It's a give and take. If I'm not duo with my adc, and I get the idea that he knows what he is doing with wave management, I'll let him do his thing when trimming or freezing, but follow his lead on pushing (if he starts spamming attacks on minions, I'll jump in too, if he doesn't, I won't). If I get the idea that he knows nothing about wave control, then I'll try and force it by attacking the wave and pinging for help when I need it.

This applies for after level 3 or so, cause before that I have a game plan for lane and I'm gonna make sure that the wave is in the spot I want it to be.

A lot of people get yelled at by their adc if they touch the wave in low elo, which even still happens a bit in high diamond. So there are reasons why supports might not touch a wave. And if its low elo, odds are neither the adc nor the support know anything about proper wave control anyways.