

Title: Your JG shouldn't be winning your lane for you

1 thing I notice a lot in low elo is that people will expect their jungler to win their lane for them and if not they just flame the jungler for any little thing. Make sure you understand what type of jungler they're playing and where they should/are pathing.

If you're expecting an Eve/Fiddle/Yi/Karthus to come gank your pushing lane at level 2 while they're on their raptors/wolves and yet to clear their 2nd buff then you may be the issue not them. Likewise if you hard shove every wave, don't ward and then die to the enemy jungler and wonder why yours hasn't ganked, you again are at fault not your jungler.

Understand their pathing too, have they just cleared their top side jungle, have their bot camps spawning up and dragon is up? Don't expect them to come gank your top lane for the next 2+ minutes until they start pathing back up toward their top camps.

Your jungler isn't at fault for you dying in lane, whether to your laner or to a gank, your junglers job isn't to hold your hand through the lane phase and make up for any poor wave management that you have. Learn to manage your play around your junglers position and pathing, realise where they are and where they are likely to be going next, you can apply the same thing to enemy junglers if you see their buffs about to spawn up, realistically they're likely to be pathing toward spawning buffs.

So many people would climb if they didn't just blame their jungler for any lane mistakes they've made themselves, realise the things you're doing wrong and improve on them.

Edit: Thanks for the awards and all the discussion, was posting as a quick tip and this blew up way more than I thought it would haha! Glad some of you found the jungle pathing advice so helpful.

The jungle prophet has spoken, let everyone hear his good word.

I agree with what your posting, but I just want to put in a word of caution to low elo junglers reading this. Don't read this post and think that you, as a jungler, don't need to effectively gank to win. If the other jungler is pulling off successful ganks and you aren't you are most likely going to lose. Not only is the other jungler most likely getting ahead, so are the lanes he is ganking. This will in turn make the neutral objective game much harder, making your life harder.

I also recommend that a winning strategy for ganking is to gank your midlaner. It will reap the most rewards for yourself as a jungler and as the team as a whole. There is a reason that duos are often mid/jg. In low elo it seems that the vast majority of the time jg's forget they can gank mid when that is the most beneficial to them.

Your jungle shouldn't be winning your lane for you, but he shouldn't be losing it for you either. Getting permaganked by the enemy jungler whilst your jungler doesn't even capitalise on it (e.g. taking enemy jungler's camps, counterganking or taking objectives) is literally the most tilting thing that can happen as a laner.

This also depends on matchups. Some lanes you just can't win pre-6 without jungle pressure (unless the other laner is bad). Doesn't mean that jungler has to come win the lane for you, but recognizing when power spikes hit and playing safe until then will mitigate the need to rely on your jungler.

Just my 2 cents.

Similarly, don't flame the botlane that was calmly winning lane against the hypercarry until getting repeatedly ganked which put them behind kills, farm, towers, objectives while you focused your energy on a couple of gromp steals.

If you did fuck all whilst we were getting assblasted and let the kog/lulu freely scale and quite literally never gank them, don't flame the botlane when they arrive into the midgame ready to roll and basically able to 2v5.
