

Title: Wave management in low ELO botlane

Score:

--- POST CONTENT ---

I'm an unranked support trying to learn more about the game. I think I'm probably around high Iron, low Bronze level right now, just haven't gotten to playing ranked. I started out as an ADC main, and watched many guides talking about farming and wave management, some of them also talking about positioning relating to those topics. However, trying to apply this in game is so hard, because very often my lane duo just does his own thing. As a support, it's even harder, because I know I should let the ADC take the farm, and trying to tell them how to farm doesn't seem effective. How do I deal with this? Is there anything I can do?

Edit: thanks a lot for the advice guys. I think I just have some issues with the lack of efficient communication, not being sure whether my ADC has an actual plan or is just playing kind of randomly makes me want to try and take charge. I'll have to work on letting them control the wave and focus on just helping them out, even if it's a bit difficult for me right now.

--- TOP COMMENTS ---

[Comment 1 | Score: 3]

Generaly (especialy as a support/jungler) you want your team to have good mental even if they make suboptimal decision , forcing "optimal" decisions is going to ruin their mental more often than not

. So even assuming you know wave management way better than the average adc in your ranks, you should let them do whatever they want with the wave they are handling and help where you can, unless you can reasonably explain to them why you think what you want to do works better and they accept it. But if you start shoving waves when they try to freeze , they will flash in your face and start typing more than playing.

So the most efficient solution is to adapt your playstyle around what your adc is trying to do and work with that.

[Comment 2 | Score: 2]

Don't try to herd your ADC and teach/push them into farming or managing the wave properly.

You can't teach every single new player you run into the fundamentals.

The best you can do is adapt and just try to do your best to implement what fundamentals you can yourself without disrupting whatever the ADC is trying to do.

If you think its a good time to push and the ADC doesn't want to push... then don't push. Even if it is the right call, its better to just be on the same page as the ADC and do your best to get them ahead and keep them alive in the meantime. If your ADC bases without shoving the lane out, and you think you can shove it out yourself quickly, then do it. The ADC won't be missing any farm because the ADC already forfeited those minions anyways when they based with bad tempo.

Once you climb higher the problem will become less common.

For now i would just suggest playing a support that can put extra gold to good use, in the cases where you are forced to take some farm because your ADC won't.

A support that can do some damage, like Zyra or Lux would be a good fit.

Wave management is going to be nonexistent in Iron and pretty nonexistent in Bronze, as well. You see it occasionally in Silver, but usually not in botlane. So just don't worry about it. You don't need to worry about Wave Management until the enemy starts using it.

[Comment 3 | Score: 1]

If you do your job well you're going to climb regardless. I'd suggest to just not worry about it. Play with the wave for the level 2 spike when you can. Hold the wave for your adc when you can. Stop assigning mental resources to things that are not your job.

[Comment 4 | Score: 1]

As a silver player, my thought process is that I just have to adapt. I look for opportunities/instances where the adc is applying concepts I have learned from guides and figuratively support those plays. Sometimes that means helping to push a wave, sometimes that means sacrificing my health bar to get my adc some space/access to the wave.

The second part of this, to me, is using my guide knowledge to make an evaluation of what kind of plays I should be looking to encourage and when/what wards I can/need to place. I have to find a moment when my adc's behavior will let me ward drake or enemy tri bush. In my experience adc's respond to my "body language", to some extent. I also use this to decide how to use my cc. Depending on the lane state I can look for engages, look to peel/position to combat a possible gank, or most often I am trying to zone enemies enough to give my adc free wave access. Most of the time I don't look to poke without my adc also trading. For context, my champs are Rakan, Taric, Bard (More solo poke, still holding cc mostly), and some Leona, and Karma (lots of solo poke still trying to hold shield for the most part).

[Comment 5 | Score: 1]

If your adc wants to push, support by getting vision and protect from ganks, Try to figure out where enemy jungle/mid is, then try to poke enemy under tower or go for a quick mid roam (probably do not do this just yet, your adc will just die most likely).

If your ADC wants to freeze, help defend ADC from poke and try to zone the enemy off the CS or poking your ADC.

If you tell the ADC what to do, you are probably forcing them to play a style they are not comfortable with, they have a game plan they win with, let them execute it and support them.