

Title: I play top lane and almost every game junglers seem to never want to gank my lane, what can I do to help this?

Score:

--- POST CONTENT ---

I like to play champs like Mordekaiser, Yorick, Warwick, Kayle and Nasus top but no matter what I do and no matter how much I beg for my junglers they always seem to just ignore top lane while the enemy JG will manage to come top and still win out on objectives.

I figure that since it's happening in every single one of my games it must be something I'm doing.

I have an average vision score from what I've seen and I manage to keep waves frozen at my side of the lane like 70% of the time but despite this I never see my JG gank anywhere other than bot

I'd really appreciate some help in figuring out what I'm doing wrong to these JG players that's making them all but refuse to come to my lane. Elo is low silver if that's any useful

--- TOP COMMENTS ---

[Comment 1 | Score: 641]

The champs you listed with the exception of Warwick are difficult or unreliable to gank for.

Yorick normally has a shove which means a dive is more than likely and will scare off a lot of junglers.

Kayle and Nasus are often useless in the early game. Which means they will often be low, in a bad position, or let the opponent have a large wave. Those factors often mean the jungler will have to 1v1 the laner, take a bad fight in a big minion wave, or there will be a level difference of the opponent.

Morde is an interesting laner to gank, as often when I find they just press r and go for the 1v1. Which if they win the jungler gets very little out of it, and if Morde loses it doesn't guarantee the jungler can clean it up and even if they do the opponent is usually very happy to at least go 1 for 1 on a gank.

If you want ganks playing a strong early game champ or someone with strong CC is ideal. Think champions like Shen, Darius, Darius, Renekton, or champs who are strong post 6 like Malphite, Ornn, Volibear(if you want to dive).

Otherwise you can often ask the jungler to help out top so you two can get Rift Herald, or prepare your wave for a gank by thinning the wave near your tower and let your jungler know you are primed for a gank. Of course this won't work 100% of the time but it helps.

[Comment 2 | Score: 544]

I think your champions play a role here.

Kayle and Nasus tend to scale decently well so junglers (or at least ME) often think to myself I don't want to gank and potentially break the freeze you have setup, as that freeze will net you so much more than a gank could ever.

On the other hand you have champs like Yorick, Warwick and Morde who I personally feel the value from getting them ahead is rather low compared to other locations on the map.

All in all though if you 1v2 just a bit of the time while never 2v1 (so never get ganked by your jungler) you are creating a net positive play on the map by just not giving up too much.

[Comment 3 | Score: 72]

Many low elo players highly value dragons and would rather take a dragon fight than gank top.

This is sometimes the correct approach and sometimes it isn't

[Comment 4 | Score: 95]

I never expect a gank at top. 2 main reasons are dragon and mid/adc. The dragon rewards are worth more to most junglers. The adc being ahead wins most teamfights the mid can usually split push better than top champs. Top is very much about wave management and self sustain. Also warding your river to keep yourself from being ganked is pretty helpful.

[Comment 5 | Score: 110]

Season 2021 is a bit different.

Back then we ganked lanes what were pushed in.

Now you gotta play a jungler what can 6 camp at 3:15 or a spamgank champion (like Elise, Shaco, Nunu). With the changes to jungle we most likely care more about Crabs than ganks (vision, speed shrine, exp, gold). You can help if you try getting free time to help secure them.

And this is just a very small part of basic jungling. You're better watching guides from youtubers.