

Title: What's the best approach to introducing someone to league of legends without over whelming them with information and being run down over and over?

Score:

--- POST CONTENT ---

After 4 years of dating, my girlfriend has finally agreed to try out league. I thought showing her the ropes would be fairly easy until I realized how much information you learn over time that there is a LOT to teach. Obviously I don't need to go over wave management, trading stance, and every champion in the game, but currently the game is just farming simulator.

I made a new account to play with her, where i'm not smurfing in the slightest, i just play her support, I rarely ward or do anything out of the ordinary to avoid smurf queue, I just sit and "coach" her as she learns to last hit and what her champion abilities do. But the smurf numbers are so high she just loses non stop. I tell her that it will get better as we lose because the smurfs will lower in number, but we ALSO have smurfs on our team so we may come out with a victory that we didn't do well at all in. It's so agonizing watching her get killed 24/7, and she asked to start fighting and so i've been trying to help her find engages, but smurfs are just rolling us. I don't know how I can make this game interesting and fun for her when not only does she have to learn a textbooks worth of information, but she also has to get run down over and over for 30 - 50 minutes while she's doing it. Just a really unfun situation and I don't see how anyone gets into the game now.

--- TOP COMMENTS ---

[Comment 1 | Score: 1357]

Start her on AI games first!!! And then move to intermediate AI when she's more comfortable. Sprinkle aram through out when in the mood to get steamrolled.

Dont bother with pvp games until she can get like a 5:1 KDA in AI

[Comment 2 | Score: 487]

Why would you do that to her, you're evil.

[Comment 3 | Score: 81]

coop vs ai until you feel she is confident. if she has no fun don't force her to play, it's not worth for both. you don't have to convince someone to do something, you can propose but the person should have the will to start to play customs game you 2 plus 3 bots vs 5 bots and both of you go to the same lane together. You play a supportive champion and just go through the basics of farming a wave etc. Champs like Alistar who can just totally deny the bots from ever fighting her are great for this. After a while you can introduce ideas of what spells do what. Talk about knowing what spell is the main way to get into a fight. Like if she is playing Miss Fortune for example, explaining that she can use her E from distance and walk up to join the fight. Then you can let her try this by doing Alistar things and engaging. at a time convenient for her.

[Comment 4 | Score: 105]

Just make sure the bots are very low difficulty so that you can do your job of bodyguarding her while she practices farming and understanding her spells. And also so that you can comfortably Q and W them away without risk of dying. You are gonna want to spend a while in this failure free state. Eventually you can crank up the bot difficulty and talk about watching what the bots do and making predictions from that about their next action. Explain to her that EVERY TIME the bot sees a certain thing it will act in a certain way. You can use guiding questions to help her make a choice of how to punish it, or if that isn't gonna work for her you can straight up say, if the bot does this certain thing I am going to go for a fight. Humans aren't as predictable as bots but they DO have habits so learning to read bots is a good step. Gradually talk a little less about your plans and just give a short warning before engaging fights etc. much like you would in real games.

You can move on to Co op vs AI here and open yourself up to roaming from botlane etc. And eventually get back to PvP.

The key here is to start with the most control of the game that you can and slowly release that control as she becomes more comfortable piloting her champion and performing basic functions like farming and buying items.

[Comment 5 | Score: 161]

I'd say just do ARAMs until she is comfortable and confident in a kit that she likes. Like it?I'll take a while. But then you're not spending 40 minutes getting dumpstered when you have a bad game. ARAMs gives her more games and more exploration of kits to learn what each champ does to an extent. Or just literally only play ARAMs with her. League is very not fun when you are new, ARAMs can make it fun to learn each kit without committing 40 minutes to getting exposed for not knowing the kit